Dear Mr. McLaughlin:

Your story on the death of Reino Hayhanen was very interesting. Unfortunately, my interest in and connection with Hayhanen ceased after the trial, and I had no knowledge of his whereabouts or activities. When the rumor cited by Miss Bernikow concerning his death in a crash on a turnpike came up, I asked someone about it as it sounded odd and was told that it was untrue as he had died of cirrhosis of the liver. As you know, Miss Bernikow quotes me on this also. Therefore, I cannot be of any assistance to you as to the accuracy or inaccuracy of your story.

Sincerely,

Reports on Abel's Betrayer in Error

Sunday Patriot-News, Harrisburg, Pa., Sept. 20, 1970

Russian Spy Buried in York County

By HARRY McLAUGHLIN, Of Our York Bureau

YORK — A new book, "Abel", says the betrayer and colleague of Russian spy Col. Rudolf Ivanovich Abel died in the late summer of 1961 in Keene, N.H. at that's incorrect. He died in York.

Reino Hayhannen, Abel's spy partner, died in York Hospital on Aug. 24, 1961, it can be strongly substantiated, and later, he was buried in Greenmount Cemetery. The only mourners at the services were his Finnish wife and agents of the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA).

The bizarre account came to light for the first time on Thursday.

Hospital and Court records showed that Hayhannen at the spy trial that he was a Donovan defended Abel, but Hayhannen's public confession records show that "J.E.L." died of a liver ailment.

The York lawyers, who settled that he and Abel were both working as spies for the Soviet Union was believed by the jury. In November, 1961, an NBC television documentary on "Abel" presented a delayed interview with Hayhannen, who appeared on the screen with a mask over his face. The television spokesmen, Chet Huntley and David Brinkley, then reported that the interview was made in July, 1961, but that Hayhannen had died a short time later. His residence and place of death were not revealed.

In Washington, D.C., yesterday, Lawrence Houston, general counsel for the CIA since its inception, said Donovan's account was incorrect.

Through a spokesman, Houston said, "Hayhannen died in a

Mrs. Decker confirmed reports that CIA agents attended a funeral and graveside services.

The service clergyman, the Rev. Robert E. Nale, pastor of Shiloh Lutheran Church, said yesterday he was convinced that Hayhannen and "J.E.L." were one and the same about two years later.

"Arrangements for the funeral were made by a lawyer from Keene, N.H., whose name appears in the new book, 'Abel', and who had worked in the spy trial," the Rev. Mr. Nale reported.

"Hayhannen, or 'J.E.L.', turned to York for a visit to the hospital and she had become a real alcoholic too. She also visited me, and, in her conversation, she often referred to herself as Hannah, the alias Mrs. Hayhannen used in applying for a passport to this country."

Hayhannen had adopted the alias, Eugene Maki, and his wife used the name Hannah Maki.

"It wasn't until I saw a published photo of Hayhannen, with a mask over his face, that convinced me he was also J.E.L.," the clergyman said. He added that he then talked to a local FBI agent about his puzzlement.

"Stranger things than that have happened, the FBI agent

Baby Girl Sure Bet With Grandmother

continuously throughout nearly every day. He fingered Abel as the Soviet Union's top spy in the United States, and admitted that he was sent here to be the No. 2 man.

Donovan said that Abel never trusted Hayhannen, and showed particular concern because of his drinking habits. He ordered Hayhannen and his wife to return to the Soviet Union, but the pair disappeared from the Soviet Union-bound airplane after its arrival in Paris.

The CIA, according to the new book written by Louise Benihow, promised permanent protection to Hayhannen and his wife, who they felt would be the continuous subjects of search by Soviet
